A big red box with many square holes of different sizes disposed in an apparent accidental manner, with a roof of white cloth; in the night the roof and the windows are illuminated by a white light. At the back a volume made of clear blocks with the windows which are all the same, narrow and high. The key of the project is in the contrast coming out from the two volumes. Fluorescent lamps light up and frame the windows, these holes in the architecture seem to keep light, they live in the light. A soft white caress comes from down in order to give life to the colour of the building and a little touch to the roof so that it can join ideally and chromatically to the sky. The remaining surface is left to the moon.
